'MID FLOATING ICE.

An "Evening World" Man's Experience in a Pilot-House.

A Trip on a Ferry-Boat Through North River Ice-Cakes.

ice Floes of To-Day and Those of Forty Years Ago.

These cold mornings, when the weather is particularly fine, passengers over the Jersey City ferries on the Pennsylvania. Central Railroad of New Jersey and Eric boats find in the ice floes of the North River a great deal that claims their attention. They flock to the forward end of the big sidewheelers and scan the rivers surface, which nowadays is thickly studded tide and a good stiff northwest wind blow-with huge congested masses.

It seems to be a source of continual delight for passengers to hang on to the iron gates and gaze wonderingly down at the swiftly moving masses of ice and listen many ferryboats then, you must remember, to the crispy churning and bumpetyit's rather early in the Winter yet, and the great hunks of ice have not started down the river, from the upper buys of Haver series and these places. All this chewed-up looking, snowy, shishey, stuff is what we call drift fee. The hardest obstacles in this line are formed of immense stretches, unbroken for hundreds of feet, and then we call it field ice. Later on field ice will float down on us and then there'll be bother for us.

steel rails of the Pennsylvania than the seat of Government at Washington. "This stuff to-day, however, causes us only a trifling inconvenience. It looks kind of masy like and bothersome, but it's only a glittering binf. Perhaps it will bother us a little in retarding the speed of the boats, Pretty soon the clanking whir of the heavy iron chains, as they flew round and round the windlass on the ferry dock, told of the tying up of the boat, and the newspaper pflots were once again on their native heather.

It was a picturesque trip.
